Summer Report

Landmark new law will clean up power plants

On May 31, the Maryland General Assembly passed the Healthy Air Act, a bill to reduce emissions from the dirtiest power plants in the state. Gov. Ehrlich signed the bill one week later.

The Healthy Air Act will require the six dirtiest power plants in Maryland to reduce the pollution that causes smog, soot, global warming, the dead zone in the bay, and mercury contamination of fish. It will require reductions of 75 percent in nitrogen oxide emissions, 85 percent in sulfur dioxide, 90 percent in mercury and 10 percent in carbon dioxide.

The bill is the strongest legislation limiting power plant emissions ever passed by any state in the country.

The law, sponsored by Sen. Paul Pinsky and Del. James Hubbard, both from Prince George's County, passed in the state Senate on May 20 by a vote of 33-14. The House of Delegates passed the bill the following week by a vote of 107-27.

Years of Work

Environment Maryland advocated for this bill for four years—most of it through the former home of our environmental work, Maryland PIRG.

Staff and advocates of Environment Maryland arranged panels of experts to testify at hearings and released seven research reports on the issue. We were on the scene throughout each legislative session to meet with lawmakers, respond to misinformation from the bill's opponents, and work with reporters to ensure accurate coverage.

Coal-fired power plants are the largest industrial source of smog, soot, mercury and global warming pollution. The Healthy Air Act will require our dirtiest plants to modernize.

Environment Maryland also knocked on tens of thousands of doors throughout the state to engage the public on the campaign.

"This campaign makes for a good blueprint of how to put a major issue on the table, gradually overcome strong opposition, and win over enough support to pass a strong new law," said Environment Maryland State Director Brad Heavner. "A lot of people put in a lot of hard work, and we were happy to be quarterbacking the effort."

Groundbreaking Policy

The new law closes a loophole in the federal Clean Air Act that power companies have exploited for decades. The loophole allowed companies to avoid installing modern pollution controls on their oldest power plants.

The bill also requires the largest sources of mercury emissions to install best available technology and requires Maryland to participate in a regional global warming agreement with seven other East Coast states.

This marks the first time that mercury and global warming pollution from power plants will be subject to limits. It will save an estimated 500 lives per year, reduce nitrogen pollution in the Chesapeake Bay, and make fish safer to eat.

Regional mercury reductions

Environment Maryland, together with a coalition of environmental and public health advocates, is calling on states throughout the region to reduce mercury emissions from power plants.

The Ozone Transport Commission is a regional body of the environmental agencies of thirteen states, from Virginia to Maine, plus the District of Columbia. The commission is currently finalizing a policy to reduce power plant pollution in each of its member states. Early drafts of the policy have included reductions in mercury emissions, but some states are pressuring their neighbors to exclude mercury from the final regulations.

"To adopt new rules to clean up power plants but not include mercury would be bad public policy," said Environment Maryland Policy Associate Chris Fick. "This pollutant is damaging babies' brains. How can they ignore it?"

While much of Maryland's mercury pollution comes from local sources, experts agree that a significant amount of mercury blows into Maryland from out of state. Maryland's Healthy Air Act could be a model for the region.

Mercury contamination documented

At the opening of fishing season, Environment Maryland Research and Policy Center released a comprehensive report in April examining all fish testing data from the past several years. It was the first time multiple databases from different state agencies were combined to get a more complete picture of mercury contamination across the state.

The study confirms that fish caught in lakes, rivers and reservoirs across Maryland contain enough mercury that they present a health risk.

The report, Mercury Pollution in Maryland, found several disturbing facts about fish contamination:

- 59 percent of fish caught and tested in Maryland contained more than 30 parts per billion (ppb) of mercury, the level above which the EPA and FDA recommend people limit their consumption.
- Nearly one in ten fish contained mercury at a concentration of 300 ppb or greater.
- The most contaminated sample had a mercury level of 2,077 ppb.

Power plants are the biggest source of mercury in Maryland, followed by municipal waste incinerators, paper production, medical waste incinerators and cement manufacturing.

Ingesting mercury causes neurological problems. Children who are exposed may have problems concentrating, display worse motor skills, and learn to walk and talk at a later age. Adults with more mercury in their bodies may be at an increased risk of experiencing a heart attack. The report estimated that in Maryland 6,000 to 12,000 unborn children are exposed in utero to levels of mercury that exceed federal safety standards.

Based on testing data from Maryland waters, the state has issued fish consumption advisories since 2001. Maryland warns the general population to limit consumption of seven species of fish from across the state.

Report from Annapolis

Clean energy victories

The Solar Energy Grant Program is the state's leading mechanism to promote solar power, providing grants to install solar energy units in homes and businesses. Yet this program has been drastically underfunded, providing grants for just 22 homeowners last year.

Environment Maryland brought together an alliance of environmental, energy and business interests to expand support for the program. Working with our partners, we convinced the governor to allocate $2.5 million for solar power. Unfortunately, the office of legislative analysis recommended cutting all but $500,000 of the funding. In the end, Environment Maryland managed to convince the General Assembly to keep $1.5 million of the funding. This support will help fund about 600 solar systems over the next year.

We also helped pass a bill to create more generous terms for connecting a building with solar panels to the electricity grid. Surplus energy they generate over the course of a month will now be counted as a credit on the following month's energy bill. In addition, we successfully advocated for legislation committing the state to reduce energy consumption by ten percent.

Mercury contamination bills

Mercury, a known neurotoxin, has long been a target for environmental and public health advocates. This year, Environment Maryland helped pass two bills that will reduce mercury pollution in Maryland. In addition to the Healthy Air Act, the General Assembly passed a bill to ban the sale and manufacture of thermostats that contain mercury. When disposed of improperly, mercury thermostats are often incinerated, contributing to the state's mercury pollution.

Environment Maryland also supported a bill that creates a program to reclaim mercury from automobiles when they are scrapped. Mercury is a component in switches used in cars, even though mercury-free alternatives exist. That bill passed the Senate but stalled in the House.

Agricultural runoff pollution

Environment Maryland continues work to make poultry companies clean up their act and to invest $100 million in conservation practices on farms. This funding is vital if Maryland hopes to meet its bay restoration deadline.

On Jan. 16, the governor responded with $15 million in new funding for agricultural conservation practices for the coming year.

In addition, the General Assembly passed a bill that contains $62 million in recommended appropriations. However, that funding is not guaranteed. The bill also makes some policy changes that will improve farmland preservation and tax credits for farmers.

"While these efforts are a good step toward helping agriculture in Maryland become more sustainable, they do not approach the level for funding needed to create healthy farms," said Jennifer Bevan-Dangel, staff attorney of Environment Maryland.

Mission Statement

We all want clean air, clean water and open spaces. But it takes independent research and tough-minded advocacy to win concrete results for our environment, especially when powerful interests stand in the way of environmental progress. That's the idea behind Environment Maryland.

We focus exclusively on protecting Maryland's air, water and open spaces. We research problems, advocate solutions, and educate and engage the public at the local, state and national levels to improve the quality of our environment and our lives.

Address service requested

To Environment Maryland Supporters

I am excited to announce the creation of Environment Maryland, the new home of Maryland PIRG's environmental work.

As you know, Maryland PIRG has worked hard for more than three decades to give the people of Maryland a voice on a range of critically important issues, especially those where powerful special interests stand in the way of reform.

Thanks to your support, we have won many victories. Maryland has cleaner air, lakes, rivers, and streams, fewer consumer rip-offs, and more open spaces than it otherwise would.

But, obviously, there is much more to be done.

After careful thought and planning, we concluded that the best way to advance all of our work—both for consumers and the environment—was to separate our organization into two distinct groups.

Environment Maryland is now doing all the environmental work previously done by Maryland PIRG. Meanwhile, Maryland PIRG will continue to be a strong and independent voice for the public interest on major issues like health care, home-owners' rights, ethics reform and more.

Environment Maryland will continue to use the same creative, results-oriented approach to our state's environmental problems that has made such a big difference over the past 30 years.

Moreover, with a clear name and a single-minded focus, we expect that Environment Maryland will be able to win the support of more pro-environment Marylanders.

And, with Maryland facing so many important environmental challenges, we all know our environment needs all the help it can get.

Thank you for all you have done to make Maryland PIRG successful—and for the generosity and support we hope you will provide as Environment Maryland launches a new era of action and advocacy for the people of Maryland.
